Pourquoi le marché n'est pas là ?

- La technologie ne permettait d'emmagasiner de grandes quantités de texte.
- Les écrans permettent la lecture, mais au détriment de nos yeux.
- Les supports informatiques sont dispendieux.
- Seulement en noir et blanc.
- La mémoire était dispendieuse.
- Des prix exorbitants.

Qu'est-ce qui a changé ?

- Des processeurs de plus en plus petits.
- De nouvelles technologies pour les écrans.
- La miniaturisation des supports informatiques.
- Des piles plus performantes.

The Legend of Josef Sardu

"One year ago a lion," said Abraham, Abraham's grandfather, "was seen in a field."

Young Masha's eyes lightened, and remembering the village hunts in the woods had yet again, or at least less quickly. He was a pale boy, underweight and sickly. His grandfathers, about as fat as they could get, sat across from him while he ate his soup, interesting him by spinning a yarn.

A lobbish man, a "gamekeeper's story" A very rare, A legend.

He was the son of a Polish nobleman. And his name was Josef Sardu. Masha Sardu, said taller than any other man, taller than any man in the village. He had to look down to see any door. But his great height, it was a burden, A blessing of birth, not a blessing. The young man suffered. His muscles lacked the strength to support his long, heavy bones. At times it was a struggle for him just to walk. He used a cane, a tall stick—taller than you—with a silver handle carved into the shape of a wolf's head, which was the family crest.

"Yes, Bobbit?" said Abraham, between sips of soup.

This was his life, and it taught him humility, which is a rare thing indeed for a nobleman to possess. He had so much compassion—for the poor, for the hardworking, for the sick. He was especially dear to the children of the village, and his goat, they profited—their own of being sick—judged with reason and mercy. He had not much of a childhood himself, watching his father's height at the age of eight, and surprising him by a feat of age nine. His father and his goat were a secret source of shame to his father. But Masha Sardu truly was a great spot, and much beloved by his people. It was said that Masha Sardu looked down on everyone, yet looked down on no one.

He nodded at her, reminding her to take another spoonful. He showed a lobbied red face, known as a "lobbied face" because of its color, its shape, its capillary-like wings. "Yes, Bobbit?"

He was also a lover of nature, and had no interest in the luxury of the hunt—but as a nobleman and a man of rank, at the age of fifteen his father and his grandfather presided upon him to accompany them on a six-week expedition to Normandy.

"To hunt, Bobbit?" said Abraham. "The goat, he came here?"

"In the forest, usually, Bobbit. The dark forest. The Sardu men, they did not come to hunt with you or bear or elk. They come to hunt wolf. The family symbol, the arms of the house of Sardu. They were hunting a hunting animal. Sardu family lore said that using wolf meat gave Sardu men courage and
